Labor market analyst John Quinterno tells host Barlow Herget that the state's "sickly economy" takes a step backward for every step forward. The loss of 13,000 state and local government jobs has hobbled the state's economy after a promising start earlier in the year, and Quinterno says President Obama's 2009 stimulus did work but the public perception is that it didn't. Prospects for private market job growth is not encouraging either, says Quinterno.
